The Transition Plan Taskforce Disclosure Framework (the “TPT Framework”) published on 9 October 2023 has been publicly welcomed by the UK’s Financial Conduct Authority (the “FCA”). For UK asset managers and portfolio managers, including private capital adviser-arrangers, this is a signal for likely change to FCA requirements on climate-related reporting.

What is the Transition Plan Taskforce Disclosure Framework?

The TPT Framework is intended to be the “gold standard for best practice transition plans” to support a range of organizations to identify, manage and report on their climate commitments with regards to the transition towards a low-carbon economy.

It provides a set of good practice recommendations to help entities across the economy make high-quality, consistent and compatible transition plan disclosures.

The TPT Framework builds on the International Sustainability Standards Board’s (“ISSB”) global non-financial reporting standards which were published earlier this year for jurisdictions to consider adopting. The ISSB standards require entities to disclose information about any climate-related transition plans an organization has, including key assumptions used in developing these plans and the dependencies on which the plan relies. It is envisaged that the TPT Framework can be used to support meeting these suggested ISSB disclosures. We discuss below the expected relevance of both the TPT Framework and the ISSB standards for asset managers (and other entities).

Why is this of interest?

The UK's Greening Finance Roadmap, published in 2021, set out commitments to introduce new, and strengthen existing, sustainability reporting requirements for a broad range of companies, including requiring the publication of climate transition plans. This has taken place so far through reporting requirements being placed on a range of entities, including those in financial services, based on the Taskforce for Climate-related Disclosures framework ("TCFD").

For UK-regulated asset managers (including private capital adviser-arrangers) and asset owners with more than £5 billion of assets under management/ownership ("In-Scope Firms") there is a requirement to make such TCFD reports in the FCA's ESG Sourcebook. With regards to transition plans, the ESG Sourcebook sets out a requirement for In-Scope Firms to "take reasonable steps" to follow the TCFD guidance, including publication of organizations' plans for transitioning to a low-carbon economy. The FCA provides further guidance in its ESG Sourcebook that where an In-Scope Firm is based in a jurisdiction which has made a net zero commitment, such as the UK, the In-Scope Firm is encouraged to assess the extent to which it has considered that commitment in developing and disclosing its transition plan. However, the reporting requirements stop short of mandating that In-Scope Firms have a transition plan in place and, if they do have one, what that plan should contain, which has been partly because the expectations of what a transition plan should cover have been fluid.

With the development of the TPT Framework, there are much clearer expectations of what a transition plan should contain and how commitments should be structured. The FCA has publicly welcomed its publication, and the TPT Framework itself signposts that "regulation is coming" with a direct reference to the FCA. This development runs alongside the UK currently undergoing an official assessment, before an expected endorsement and adoption, of the ISSB standards which, as set out above, are linked to the TPT Framework in that they require organizations to publish any climate-related transition plans they have.

It seems, as with the staggered rollout of TCFD reporting, that listed companies will be the first of any future compliance with the TPT Framework and ISSB standards, based on the documents released by the TPT. However, overall, the indicators are clear that the regulatory landscape on climate-related reporting for FCA-regulated firms, including asset managers, is on course for change in coming years. The momentum is in the direction of adoption of ISSB standards that require disclosure of climate transition plans with the TPT Framework guiding companies on how to formulate those plans.

What can UK asset managers do now?

The TPT Framework advises firms to ensure that transition plans are not viewed as merely a compliance exercise but that they form a critical component of a firm's business – helping to explain to clients, shareholders and investors their contribution to the transition to net zero.

For all asset managers, but particularly those in scope of the current ESG Sourcebook, we would recommend early review of the TPT Framework either to carry out a:

1. gap analysis of existing transition plans against the TPT Framework; or
2. a readiness assessment to meet the requirements where there is no current transition plan.

Such actions can be carried out with reference to what the TPT describes as "deep dive" guidance for asset managers which will be published next month in November 2023*. Getting ahead will be important – obtaining the data and metrics to support any transition plans may pose some challenges, and robust disclosures will be even more critical with the imminent introduction of the FCA's anti-greenwashing rule for UK asset managers via their Sustainability Disclosure Requirements. Asset Management Sector Guidance Consultation*

The proposed Asset Managers Sector Guidance (the “AM Guidance”) was published by the TPT for consultation on 13 November. The AM Guidance supplements the TPT Framework by providing additional sector-specific guidance for ten of the nineteen areas of the TPT Framework with further depth and detail for preparers of transition plans operating in the asset management sector.

The AM Guidance is framed by setting out that “private finance has a crucial role to play” in the flow of finance required to deliver net zero and the Paris Agreement objectives by 2050. The AM Guidance further sets out that asset managers need to develop transition plans that preserve and create value for their clients by reducing their emissions, managing exposures to climate-related risks and opportunities and contributing to the economy wide transition. The development and disclosure of robust, credible, and sector-appropriate transition plans will allow asset managers to communicate to their stakeholders how they are preparing for and responding to the transition and update them on progress. To support these aims, the AM Guidance sets out recommendations that asset managers “should consider disclosing”, which need to be read in conjunction with the wider TPT Framework’s required or suggested disclosures.

If asset managers or any other relevant stakeholders have any feedback on the proposed AM Guidance it must be provided by 29 December 2023.
